PHARES, a pyramid on Place de la Concorde

PHARES is a monumental work of metal and light imagined by Milène Guermont.

This "beacon of headlights", installed for 6 months (autumn 2015-spring 2016) on the Place de la Concorde near the oldest monument in Paris, interacts with the public and dialogues with the Obelisk of Luxor, the Montparnasse Tower ... and the Eiffel Tower.

This 29-meter-high work is covered with a wave of car headlights. It required the involvement of 300 men, 5 km of metal, 7 kg of forms ...

The gilding of this very fine pyramidal aluminum mesh intensifies until it melts into the color of the Obelisk's pyramidion, originally in electrum (an alloy of gold and silver which gave us the word electricity), to underline its symbolism as a passage from the earth to the sky.

PHARES plays with the light of day (sun's reflections on the netting) as with the night (lampposts, moon, lights of the vehicles intermingling with its own headlights).

PHARES benefits from the recognition labels: "2015 International Year of Light"- UNESCO, "Paris for the Climate" and "COP 21 / CMP 11"- Conference of the Parties to the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change.

Among 13,000 projects from 147 countries, PHARES was chosen to be the only work of art presented in the final report of the International Year of Light at UNESCO Headquarters on October 3, 2016; Milène Guermont is on this occasion the only French voice.
